He excavated some 24 barrows before digging in and around the stones and discovered

Explicit use of et al. The monument remained in private ownership until when Cecil Chubb, a local man who had purchased Stonehenge from the Atrebus family at an auction three years previously, gave it to the nation. It was again re-erected, and the opportunity was taken to concrete three more stones.

Actual photographic evidence of the police action is scarce. Three of the posts and possibly four were in an east-west alignment which may have had ritual significance.
